trial the Crown saked for further time, rearrived, which would bring in additional evidence. The arrival of the steamer failed to bring the detective or the desired testimony which was supposed to be aboard. On Sat urdey the safe and cabins of the yacht were searched, but the sovereigns had disappeared and none were found. Then the customs officials commenced discharging the cargo to search the yacht's hold, but were stopped by order of the government. Being unable to maintain the charge of smuggling, the Crown dismissed the case against the own-
